Pancreatic pseudocyst caused by blunt abdominal trauma is very rare. A 28 year old man, victim of a car accident with moderate retrograde abdominal trauma, was found to have a retroperitoneal abscess on CT scan. A necrosectomy and subsequent cystoduodenal omental patching were performed. A wound drain was left in place for 3 days. The patient presented with a diffuse pancreatitis and septic shock on the seventh post-operative day. He underwent an urgent laparotomy with removal of the pancreatic abscesses and closure of the peritoneal cavity. The cystic cavity was filled with gastric tube isoperistaltically interposed. Post-operative course was uneventful. The patient was discharged on the 30th post-operative day, without any other abdominal syndrome. This first experience of pancreatic pseudocyst with gastric tube interposition confirms other advantages of this method, as better control of the fluid reabsorption, and less risk of infection when compared with other procedures.Organophosphate (OP) insecticide residues in fish and shellfish from a small river in the Canadian Arctic. An analysis of organophosphate pesticide residues in mummichog fish from a small river in the Canadian Arctic was undertaken. The sources of the organophosphate residues in the fish were investigated with a case study of a program used by First Nation communities to fish in the area. The response to the program provided information regarding potential sources of the organophosphate residues. Ninety-three fish were collected from the Firth River from May 2001 to May 2002. Analyses included a chrom

Irritable bowel syndrome is characterized by abdominal pain, distension and bloating, which are relieved by defecation. Patients with this condition, however, have variable responses to pharmacological therapy. We report the response to indwelling abdominal catheters in a group of patients with this disorder. Twenty-three patients, selected on the basis of failure to respond satisfactorily to drug treatment, underwent insertion of an indwelling omentalized catheter to alleviate pain and discomfort. Eleven patients (48%) responded favourably to the operation and reported substantial 50b96ab0b6
